the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age has increased from 1.1 billion to 1.5 billion, and the number of people aged 65 and over has increased from 0.2 billion to 0.5 billion (United Nations, 2002).

There are a number of reasons why the world's population is ageing. One of the main reasons is that the number of people who are living longer is increasing. This is due to a number of factors, including improvements in healthcare, better nutrition, and a decline in the number of people who are dying from preventable causes.

Another reason why the world's population is ageing is that the number of people who are having children is decreasing. This is due to a number of factors, including a decline in the number of people who are getting married, a decline in the number of people who are having children, and a decline in the number of people who are having children at a young age.

The world's population is ageing, and this is a trend that is likely to continue for many years to come. This has a number of implications for the world, including a decline in the number of people who are working, a decline in the number of people who are paying taxes, and a decline in the number of people who are contributing to the economy.

There are a number of ways in which the world can deal with the ageing population. One way is to increase the number of people who are working, by encouraging people to work longer hours or by encouraging people to work in different ways. Another way is to increase the number of people who are paying taxes, by increasing the number of people who are paying taxes or by increasing the amount of tax that people are paying.
